Description/content	The Graduate School Language & Literature Munich was founded in 2013 with the goal of enhancing academic conditions for doctoral candidates in linguistics, literature, language education, and cultural studies/cultural history at the Faculty of Languages and Literatures of the Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München. The Graduate School consists of four classes: <ul style="list-style-type: none">• Class of Language• Class of Literature• Class of Language Education• Class of Culture and History The graduate school offers outstanding young researchers an excellent environment for the advancement of their careers. It offers access to a network of internationally renowned scholars, support for young scholars, and access to local, national, and international resources. Moreover, the programme is embedded in LMU's outstanding institutional and research-driven infrastructure. The Class of Language's programme focuses on linguistic theory, language use, and the interrelation thereof. Doctoral dissertations comprise studies from a general linguistic viewpoint, comparative approaches, and the investigation of a specific language (synchronic or historic). The Class of Literature aims at establishing literary studies as a fundamental discipline in cultural research and in the realm of media research. It is supported by all faculties involved in literary studies. It provides a framework for study in which literature is approached from a wide variety of theoretical and methodological perspectives.

The Class of Language Education investigates the processes and results of teaching and learning language, literature, and culture in first, second, and foreign languages, both in school and outside school contexts. Dissertation projects can deal with historical, theoretical, or empirical questions in language, literature, or media didactics, as well as classroom research.

The Class of Culture and History offers doctoral students the opportunity to study major issues in the history, culture, media, politics, and society of the United States, Canada, and the Americas, including the Caribbean. The programme aims to frame the Americas beyond their colonial and nation-state boundaries by situating them as a region of global interdependencies.

Additional support is offered by the GraduateCenter.

Course Details

Course organisation

The programme covers six semesters, and the courses are taught in collaboration with faculty members. The majority of the qualifications necessary for attaining the degree can be acquired in courses specifically designed to suit the students' needs. That is, the customary distinction between major and minor subjects is abandoned. We thus hope to raise the standard of theoretical discussions and encourage the candidates' willingness to take part in interdisciplinary work. Instead of a final examination encompassing the major and minor subjects, the candidates are required to defend their dissertations by proving their abilities in academic innovation and interdisciplinary communication.

Core curriculum:

- interdisciplinary colloquia in which candidates will report at length on the progress of their project and discuss their colleagues' projects
- interdisciplinary seminars that test contemporary methodological developments and new approaches in research by practical application
- symposia, workshops and en-bloc-seminars that allow for discussion of problems arising as well as giving room for summary of past accomplishments and planning of further research

International elements

- International guest lecturers
- Specialist literature in other languages
- Training in intercultural skills
- Projects with partners in Germany and abroad
